Earth, but not oblivion, closed,

By the mine-lamp's feeble glimmer That young heart, in growing gloom, As the lamp of life waxed dimmer, Had to hew its metal tomb. Sixty years had backward glided, Many hundred fathoms deep, To the spot men's hands were guided,

Where the miner sank to sleep. But, as pure and lustrous, burning, Sleeps in earth's dark womb the gold, on to yellow dullness turning. Through men's hands, by daylight, rolled,-So the rock eternal, closing, In its pure ambrosial breath Held the sleeper safe reposing Changeless, in the sleep of death.

When he now, to light up-taken, Blooming like a morn of May. By the radiant sun forsaken, In the sight of all men lay ; With mute looks each asked the other What could be the strange youth's name And among the rest a mother, On a crutch, by chance, there came. Through the crowd the mourner presses,
